Wallis Announces Heidi Duckler Dance

Heidi Duckler Dance will premiere the Illuminating The Chandelier through a livestream on Thursday, April 30 at 5 pm and be subsequently available on demand. The streamed work is a precursor to and shortened version of the dance company's live performance titled The Chandelier, originally slated to be premiered at the Wallis Annenberg Center for the Performing Arts this spring, but postponed due to the pandemic. It is now adapted to address social distancing circumstances during the dire Covid-19 situation.

The performance will feature dancers, musicians, composers and designers working collaboratively from afar to create a show that audiences around the world can stream. The live streamed performance is free; registration is required. There is a suggested $15 donation to the Heidi Duckler Dance.

Both Illuminating the Chandelier and The Chandelier are based on the novel The Chandelier by Brazilian author Clarice Lispector.

"While following a similar narrative as the longer live dance piece, Illuminating The Chandelier focuses specifically on the interior monologue of a woman in isolation who experiences dissociated, dream-like feelings and has trouble connecting to the world around her," said Artistic Director Heidi Duckler. "Through layers of imagery and acts of repetition, the work explores the contrasting ideas of impermanence and the irrevocable, especially in the context of what we as a society are all going through in this moment."

"Heidi Duckler Dance's powerful and thought-provoking piece Illuminating The Chandelier addresses very real issues brought on by the pandemic while magnifying the company's legacy of doing site-specific work as it takes audiences into the homes of its dancers. It also illustrates the company's nimbleness and keen ability to react to cultural shifts, quickly pivoting and adapting its work and creative process to produce performances that unite diverse communities in unexpected ways," said the Wallis' Artistic Director Paul Crewes.
